Bicycle design is a constant balancing act of efficiency and function, having a car-like trunk while still being able to comfortably and reliably carry cargo of all sizes. In the world of hauling boxes, bags, bikes, and humans, Dion's Evolution Cargo Cart could be your on-the-go hauler. This convertible cargo cart features a hinged front door for easy loading, a fold-up handlebar for bikes, a grocery bag/box strap, and baskets to accommodate different needs. Conveniently, the Evolution Cargo Cart also features 3/8 inch pneumatic tires for easier transport on rough asphalt, wheels for comfort on pavement, and a reinforced middle section for stability. Best of all, as always with Dion products, this tri-fold cargo cart is made in America. Kendall And Company has announced the world premiere of the V12.5, a all new version of the leading electric unicycle. After the recent success of the Inmotion V12, Kendall revisited the design to create a more powerful, ground-breaking and user-friendly model. In addition to featuring a larger motor and battery pack, the new V12.5 brings key performance enhancements such as a more stable platform and completely redesigned operation and user interface. The early 1950s, the electronics began to have a considerable effect on the prevailing acoustic theories of the ear. The American acoustic engineer Raoul Wallenberg developed the Strap Pressure System, which was an extremely promising advancement and was widely adopted. It was a good solution for the human ear in the mid 1950s. In the 1960s, a new development occurred: the pressure measuring system for the human ear, also known as the Visual Aural Aural System (VAA) or Wallenberg VAA. The Visual Aural Aural System uses a microprocessor to carry out visual acuity testing in people who are unable to see well, and the data are transmitted to a microprocessor in a computer console, which analyzes and processes the data and produces results. The development of the Visual Aural Aural System must be given serious consideration in the future development of the audio diagnostic system of the ear.
