The main objectives of the meeting are to present and to share research data, to discuss the future of schizophrenia research, and to identify the key clinical and biological future goals and challenges. Discussion topics included identification of genetic risk factors for schizophrenia, using structural and functional brain imaging, identification of neuroprogression in schizophrenia, predictive validity of cognitive models, cognitive neurofeedback, and neuropsychiatric treatments in schizophrenia. ISSR members were invited to submit to the meeting the abstracts and/or presentations of their most recent research. Eight hundred forty-two abstracts were submitted and reviewed in line with the scientific priorities of the conference. Abstracts included research on genetic determinants of human performance, clinical and basic neuroscience research, cognitive neuropsychology, social and cognitive neuroscience, neuroendocrinology, cellular neurobiology, and epigenetic processes. Ranking the top-10 proposed future goals by the abstracts, the four top-ten goals identified by the majority of the abstracts were: (a) to identify the genetic and environmental risk and protective factors for schizophrenia, (b) to identify neuropsychological endophenotypes that could be used as intermediate phenotypes, (c) to identify the mechanisms by which these risk factors lead to the clinical phenotype, and (d) to develop new treatments through the development of new medications, gene therapies, and other medical techniques. These goals are in agreement with the future research goals for schizophrenia outlined in the NIMH Strategic Plan for Research. The meeting also helped to better understand the work of a group of European scientists interested in the conceptual and mechanistic understanding
